land²⁰ (1659). Also omitted are the Dutch names for Delaware Bay: Zuyt Baye (1624), Nieuw Port May (1625), and Godins Bay (1630–1640); and for the Delaware River: Zuydt-Revier (1624), Willems Rivier (1630–1640), Prince Hendricx Riv[i]er (1649), and Nassaw Riv[i]er (1659). These have all been cited earlier in this volume.²¹

The first group of names that follows includes those of Dutch (or occasionally German) provenience listed and discussed by Dunlap in his 1956 monograph on Dutch and Swedish place-names in the state of Delaware.²² The date in parentheses following the name is that of the earliest form on record; the spelling is also (as a rule) that of the earliest form, and thus may vary considerably from later forms of the same word. Where a translation of the word seems in order, the Dunlap translation is given. Multiple names for the same feature in the list are separated by commas; when a number or letter represents a cluster of features, these features are separated by semicolons.

1. Cape Cornelius (1625), Zuijt Hoek (1630) ("south cape"), Cabo Hinlopen (c.1629).²³

²³ This name was applied to False Cape as early as 1625, but it later became the name of the Delaware cape at the entrance to Delaware Bay. For a discussion of the shift, see Dunlap 1956, pp. 31-33. The form given above appears on the map entitled Caerte vande Suydt Rivier in Nieu Nederland.
