On a recent cruise, the vessel to which Mr. Bayard was attached, stopped at Naples and while there, he obtained permission to visit Mt. Vesuvius. On his arrival at the crater an eruption took place throwing a number of stones and other matter several feet into the air; one of the stones in falling struck him on his right arm, below the shoulder and shattered it so as to render amputation necessary. His condition when the vessel left was such that he could not accompany it, and great fears were entertained of his recovery.
